While many spent their winter breaks at home, the Sinfonicron Light Opera Company cast, orchestra and crew spent most of their break on campus rehearsing. This year, Sinfonicron performed the classic tale The Secret Garden, by Frances Hodgson Burnett (adapted for stage by Lucy Simon and Marsha Norman), but with a new viewpoint.

Director Dan Plehal and the cast spent much of rehearsal time analyzing the script and developing characters. "The Secret Garden is a well-known and often-performed show that can be good with a normal amount of effort," senior Plehal said. "But in order to make the show great, it needs to be pushed beyond its normal boundaries and layered with strong choices and conceptualizations." Most of the big decisions made dealt with the interaction between the living in the dead. The line was often blurred, and it became difficult to tell who was alive and who was not.

This interaction especially challenged audience members in scenes such as the Finale of Act I ("Final Storm"). This scene was also tricky to perform for both cast, orchestra, and crew members. "It had a lot going on, many different musical themes overlapping and almost the entire cast on stage, not to mention multiple locations, ghostly apparitions, and a maze," Plehal said. These ghostly apparitions, or "dreamers," flooded the stage with their long cloaks and hauntingly powerful melodies, leaving many audience members with goose bumps. After the performance, audience member freshman Kate Reid recalled the scene as being "awesome to hear and see." Moths stimulated audience members to challenge their own beliefs about what happens after death. Plehal asked his audience members to look at life as more than an "all-or-nothing state of being," as a measure of "quantity." Overall, The Secret Garden brought new twists to what many considered an already beloved tale. Plehal’s directing decisions stimulated audience members to challenge their own beliefs about what happens after death. Plehal asked his audience members to look at life as more than an "all-or-nothing state of being," as a measure of "quantity." As Archibald Craven reminded Mary Lennox, "they’re not gone, you see, just dead."

The performances ran smoothly, except for during the final performance, when the lights went off randomly. It took technicians nearly 15 minutes to find and fix the problem. Freshman Chelsea Marotta, who plays viola in the orchestra, panicked slightly in the pit. "I didn’t even realize they were out on stage when they first went off." Marotta said. "I was totally shocked when I realized it wasn’t just us!" Fortunately, the show continued untroubled after the problem was discovered and fixed.

Overall, The Secret Garden brought new twists to what many considered an already beloved tale. Plehal’s directing decisions stimulated audience members to challenge their own beliefs about what happens after death.

---

Sinfonicron Light Opera puts new spin on The Secret Garden

The Secret Garden is a well-known and often-performed show that can be good with a normal amount of effort. But in order to make the show great, it needs to be pushed beyond its normal boundaries and layered with strong choices and conceptualizations. Most of the big decisions made dealt with the interaction between the living and the dead. The line was often blurred, and it became difficult to tell who was alive and who was not.

This interaction especially challenged audience members in scenes such as the Finale of Act I (“Final Storm”). This scene was also tricky to perform for both cast, orchestra, and crew members. “It had a lot going on, many different musical themes overlapping and almost the entire cast on stage, not to mention multiple locations, ghostly apparitions, and a maze,” Plehal said. These ghostly apparitions, or “dreamers,” flooded the stage with their long cloaks and hauntingly powerful melodies, leaving many audience members with goose bumps. After the performance, audience member freshman Kate Reid recalled the scene as being “awesome to hear and see.”

The performance also featured simpler scenes with less complexities. Archibald Craven and Dr. Neville Craven, played by juniors Thomas Brigham and Barrett Armbruster respectively, infused the smaller number “Lily’s Eyes” with emotion as they sang of lost love. Although much of the play intellectually stimulated audience members, numbers such as “If I Had a Fine White Horse” added comic relief to the story. Rebecca Phillips played the character of Martha lightly and humorously. Plehal especially enjoyed this scene. “It gave us the opportunity to push the humor and physical comedy as far as we could,” he said.

The performances ran smoothly, except for during the final performance, when the lights went off randomly. It took technicians nearly 15 minutes to find and fix the problem. Freshman Chelsea Marotta, who plays viola in the orchestra, panicked slightly in the pit. “I didn’t even realize they were out on stage when they first went off.” Marotta said. “I was totally shocked when I realized it wasn’t just us!” Fortunately, the show continued untroubled after the problem was discovered and fixed.

---

Sinfonicron Light Opera puts new spin on The Secret Garden

The Secret Garden is a well-known and often-performed show that can be good with a normal amount of effort. But in order to make the show great, it needs to be pushed beyond its normal boundaries and layered with strong choices and conceptualizations. Most of the big decisions made dealt with the interaction between the living and the dead. The line was often blurred, and it became difficult to tell who was alive and who was not.

This interaction especially challenged audience members in scenes such as the Finale of Act I (“Final Storm”). This scene was also tricky to perform for both cast, orchestra, and crew members. “It had a lot going on, many different musical themes overlapping and almost the entire cast on stage, not to mention multiple locations, ghostly apparitions, and a maze,” Plehal said. These ghostly apparitions, or “dreamers,” flooded the stage with their long cloaks and hauntingly powerful melodies, leaving many audience members with goose bumps. After the performance, audience member freshman Kate Reid recalled the scene as being “awesome to hear and see.”

The performance also featured simpler scenes with less complexities. Archibald Craven and Dr. Neville Craven, played by juniors Thomas Brigham and Barrett Armbruster respectively, infused the smaller number “Lily’s Eyes” with emotion as they sang of lost love. Although much of the play intellectually stimulated audience members, numbers such as “If I Had a Fine White Horse” added comic relief to the story. Rebecca Phillips played the character of Martha lightly and humorously. Plehal especially enjoyed this scene. “It gave us the opportunity to push the humor and physical comedy as far as we could,” he said.

The performances ran smoothly, except for during the final performance, when the lights went off randomly. It took technicians nearly 15 minutes to find and fix the problem. Freshman Chelsea Marotta, who plays viola in the orchestra, panicked slightly in the pit. “I didn’t even realize they were out on stage when they first went off.” Marotta said. “I was totally shocked when I realized it wasn’t just us!” Fortunately, the show continued untroubled after the problem was discovered and fixed.

---

Sinfonicron Light Opera puts new spin on The Secret Garden

The Secret Garden is a well-known and often-performed show that can be good with a normal amount of effort. But in order to make the show great, it needs to be pushed beyond its normal boundaries and layered with strong choices and conceptualizations. Most of the big decisions made dealt with the interaction between the living and the dead. The line was often blurred, and it became difficult to tell who was alive and who was not.

This interaction especially challenged audience members in scenes such as the Finale of Act I (“Final Storm”). This scene was also tricky to perform for both cast, orchestra, and crew members. “It had a lot going on, many different musical themes overlapping and almost the entire cast on stage, not to mention multiple locations, ghostly apparitions, and a maze,” Plehal said. These ghostly apparitions, or “dreamers,” flooded the stage with their long cloaks and hauntingly powerful melodies, leaving many audience members with goose bumps. After the performance, audience member freshman Kate Reid recalled the scene as being “awesome to hear and see.”

The performance also featured simpler scenes with less complexities. Archibald Craven and Dr. Neville Craven, played by juniors Thomas Brigham and Barrett Armbruster respectively, infused the smaller number “Lily’s Eyes” with emotion as they sang of lost love. Although much of the play intellectually stimulated audience members, numbers such as “If I Had a Fine White Horse” added comic relief to the story. Rebecca Phillips played the character of Martha lightly and humorously. Plehal especially enjoyed this scene. “It gave us the opportunity to push the humor and physical comedy as far as we could,” he said.

The performances ran smoothly, except for during the final performance, when the lights went off randomly. It took technicians nearly 15 minutes to find and fix the problem. Freshman Chelsea Marotta, who plays viola in the orchestra, panicked slightly in the pit. “I didn’t even realize they were out on stage when they first went off.” Marotta said. “I was totally shocked when I realized it wasn’t just us!” Fortunately, the show continued untroubled after the problem was discovered and fixed.