Charlottesville, 8th Aug. 1823.

My dear Sir,

Being conscious of no good intention, I hope that this address will, at least, give you no offense. When I did myself the pleasure of calling upon you, it was with the purpose not to solicit you to aid the object of my mission, because I conceived that we had no claims upon you, nor do I now imagine that you are under any obligations to comply with the request about to be made. But the approbation which you appeared to me to manifest of my design has lead to the hope that you may be willing to give some further tokens of your good will towards a scheme which is accomplished and, in my opinion, exert a happy influence on the condition of our fellow men both now and forever.

I am myself perfectly satisfied that besides the assistance which my contribution from you will afford, your name would render me, in my agency, the most essential service. It is this conviction that has induced me to trouble you.
you. I know that you are friendly to all the means that are calculated to improve the intellect and moral character of our people. And I do think that no means are likely to be more efficient than the labors of a gospel ministry respectable for their learning and piety.

I know that there are strong prejudices against the church of which I am a member and on whose behalf I plead; but, sir, like all other prejudices they are unsupported by reason. I am not afraid to affirm with confidence that the presbyterians have ever been the most zealous supporters of liberty. The very genius of our church is a spirit of independence and the first principles of our government. As David Hume said well that no monarch would choose the presbyterian for the established religion of his government. But we have been suspected of desiring an establishment. This, however, is an unwarranted suspicion. We believe that the religion of Christ has suffered more from such holy alliances than from all its enemies.

And with this conviction, we cannot honestly desire such a state of things. We do not desire it. We never did desire it. And if we did, we believe that the thing would be wholly impracticable.
I know not whether, or not this suspicion has ever reached your mind, but I hope you will see that it has no ground on which to support itself. As to political parties the Presbyterian Church has ever been much divided. We all think, as we have a right to think, for ourselves.

Our plan is in relation to a theological seminary to create an institution independent of all literary institutions in which there shall be three professorships, one of Oriental languages, one of Ecclesiastical History and Church Polity, and one of Didactic Theology. We wish to have it near some college that our students (for we take up indigent young men of petty talents and educate them for the ministry) may have the advantage of a collegiate education. Our doors will always be open to all of every denomination who may choose to avail themselves of the advantages of the School. There shall be a subscription paper which I must hope will be returned with your name. Your compliance with this request will greatly oblige a respectable body of Christians, but more than the agent of the Presbyterian, who is yours respectfully.

If, my dear Sir, you should condescend to reply to this communication, please to send your answer to the care of Mr. Bowman, Charlottesville.
