Hugo de Bury, who governed these lands, agreed to pay 1400 ciphers to the Emperor for the protection of this province, according to the agreement he had made with the Emperor. However, since the Emperor was unwilling to pay for the protection of the province, Hugo de Bury was obliged to find another defender for the province. After searching for several months, Hugo de Bury finally found a suitable person to defend the province. This person agreed to defend the province for a period of 3 years, and Hugo de Bury paid him 1500 ciphers as a fee for his services.

Since Hugo de Bury was not willing to pay for the protection of the province, the Emperor decided to take matters into his own hands. He sent his representative to Hugo de Bury to negotiate the matter. After several weeks of discussion, an agreement was reached. Hugo de Bury agreed to pay the Emperor 1500 ciphers for the protection of the province, and the Emperor agreed to provide the necessary protection.

However, Hugo de Bury was not satisfied with the protection provided by the Emperor. He felt that the Emperor was not giving enough attention to the province. As a result, he decided to seek help from other sources. He approached several nobles and asked them to provide protection for the province.
Several nobles agreed to help, and Hugo de Bury paid them a fee for their services.

In conclusion, Hugo de Bury was able to find sufficient protection for the province by paying a reasonable fee to the Emperor and other nobles.
This ensured the safety of the province and its inhabitants.
