1913-

Merry Christmas
As summer ships sailing by O'er sunlit seas with cloudless sky,
May Christmas come with golden hue Bring health, wealth, joy, good luck to you.

With the best of good wishes for Christmas

Mrs. M. Heilman

Many Happy Returns of the Day
THE ROSARY

A physically impoverished, poverty poor newsboy,
With coral white lips
Lay on a cot in a sily hospital,
In a large front room, facing the morning sun,
Rested the wife of a rich man.
A gentle nurse watched over them both
And carried everyday from the room of the rich woman, Roses, to the poor boy's cot.

The boy in his keen young life,
Felt the impulse of sympathy, felt the silken tie,
The silvery link of sympathy Sympathy that binds lip heart to heart and mind to mind, Soon the roses began to grow on the boy's cheeks, Strength returned and that happy day known to most of us arrived, the day when they mark on the register "discharged Cured". On leaving the hospital the boy passed The door of the wealthy unknown woman, he asked permission to speak to her to thank her, the rules deprived him; Reverently, sacrely, he drew from about his neck a Tallisman, and kissing the heads, he sent it to the woman in the large front room, sent them as a prayer for her speedy recovery and she did recover much sooner than the physicians expected. Each had sent one of the links that hold this earth to heaven, sympathy.
Religious blush, religious veil their sacred fires, priests and preachers remain mute; when sympathy is sending its wonderful wireless from one human heart in distress to another soul in sadness. It is the hour that builds monuments for the one great belief a belief that is bigger than forms of worship, bigger than the early training of the Italian boy or that of the American woman.
Without words both had breathed a prayer; one had sent roses the other had sent the Rosary.
Both had kissed the Cross.
