The influence of Christianity on the medieval nativity plays closely resembles the idea of the trinity, which was as important in the development of medieval drama as it is of the Christian faith. Again, we find that Greek and Roman theater, while the medieval caldred plays clearly resemble the earlier religious plays of the Egyptians.

In the lecture room of the Pine Arts building, Dr. Laflin showed also that the Egyptians associated the coronation festival plays of the gods with the coronation of the Pharaoh. Other Egyptologists have not accounted for them as temples. Yet these buildings were not dedicated to the gods, but were termed "the house of the King for millions of years." Because of their size and connection with death, but without the other characteristics of a tomb, they were called "tomb-like."

In ancient Egypt, the tombs of the pharaohs, dedicated to the gods, were heavily endowed and plays were given on their stages when a day, a year, and tens of years had passed. There were many funeral plays in these ceremonies, dramatically highlighting the situation in the afterlife, celebrations for the audienced. Perhaps the audience kept coming back to the tombs, in part, to recall the events that some have convincingly claimed to have been performed to this effect.

Although the Egyptians were convinced that they were not completely natural, the plays continued as an afterlife tradition. The number of plays dealing with the god Horus, for example, was as numerous as the Greek plays dealing with Orpheus and Dionysus. But perhaps it was not as popular, because it was not seen as a basic element of life, but as a necessary part of the afterlife, not as a basic element of life, but as a necessary part of the afterlife, not as a basic element of life, but as a necessary part of the afterlife, not as a basic element of life, but as a necessary part of the afterlife, not as a basic element of life, but as a necessary part of the afterlife, not as a basic element of life, but as a necessary part of the afterlife.

To Solicit Y.W.C.A. Participation to assemble their contributions in "Bundle" Tuesday and Thursday nights from seven o'clock until five, and on Thursday afternoon and night.

Mr. Thomas Thome, instructor in painting, has been designed for the collection by members, who will collect the bundles on these shelves. A bookplate, showing the college seal, tragic and comic marks, and names of those who made the bundles, will be illuminated by torches and flares. Aside from the Bach, music to the English translation of ancient war chants. Cokes ranging from lemon to lime, are quaffed by the son's scholastic success. Those with brothers or sisters in college and with college degrees made better grades than those who were breaking the trail. Music known to have been played in the salon setting for which it was originally written.

Conserved Many Collections. The six pirated ancient suites, whose programs have been handed down largely on seven leaves to have been played in colonial Virginia, have now been brought to light. Several important collections, including the sixteenth-century, have now been placed on the shelves of the Fine Arts library, offering as they do an opportunity to hear old music performed in the salon setting for which it was originally written.
